It's party time

It would not be erroneous to speculate that these days, chintan bathaks at 6 Deen Dayal Upa-dhyaya Marg — the swanky headquarters of the Bharatiya Janata Party in New Delhi — tend to dwell on ways to cross the chair sau seat hurdle in the ongoing parliamentary elections. At another address in the same city, 24 Akbar Road — the Congress HQ — the mood could well be that of aar ya paar; this, after all, is a do or die poll battle for India's Grand Old Party that has been, for a decade, a mere pawn to the BJP's dashing knight on the chessboard of power. But what could possibly be on the minds of the minders of the 'political' party located in Patna's Khagaul Road?

At a time when India's national and regional outfits are hatching plans to occupy Delhi's kursi, The Plurals Party, which, Wikipedia says, is located on the third floor of the Sukhbaso Complex on Patna's Khagaul Road, may well be thinking of Immanuel Kant. If this — it is an uneducated guess — makes it an oddity, it would be a pity. That's because when Indian politics has turned its face away from philosophical values or vision, The Plurals Party pledges "Kantianism", apart from "progressivism", "liberalism" and "decentralisation", as the pillar of the ideological template that it wants the nation to embrace. Timing is of the essence in politics, and The Plurals Party's evocation of Kant is well-timed — the German philosopher's tercentennial birth anniversary fell only a week ago.

Why China disbanded once-touted Strategic Support Force: Implications for India

As a part of the most touted major security structure reforms, Chinese President Xi Jinping created the Strategic Support Force (SSF) in December 2015. And now, on April 19, 2024, the SSF met its death knell in a yet another restructuring of the People's Liberation Army (PLA). The PLA now has three independent branches: the Information Support Force (ISF), the Cyberspace Force, and the Aerospace Force. China is known for its lack of transparency. Whether this change has been done to enhance military operational capability or to exercise greater political oversight and direct control over various elements is being analysed. Could corruption have played a part in Xi's decision, is being speculated.

The Ukraine conflict has surely highlighted the importance of the logistics and information domains. Space and cyber are other very dominant operational domains. Aerospace force could mean the partial merging of air and space domains. It may be recalled that China created the "Near Space Command" in November 2023.

The 2015 PLA reforms brought in major structural changes, including the formation of theatre commands. The then newly created SSF was focused on space, counter-space, and information warfare capabilities. It was meant to improve the PLA's ability to fight what China calls formalised conflicts and to simultaneously enhance the PLA's power projection capabilities in space and cyberspace. SSF was designed to ease intelligence sharing and coordination with departments of the different branches.

The nearly 250,000 personnel force represented nearly 10 per cent of the military. The SSF was on par with the other military services and the PLA's five operational theatre commands. Later, the overall responsibility for national and joint military communication networks was also shifted to SSF control.

The SSF oversaw all units responsible for psychological warfare, information warfare, space warfare, cyberwarfare, and electronic warfare operations. With so many tasks, command and control were spread thin, and individual units were vying for resources. Also, the expertise required to command such a multifaceted force was complex. The SSF consolidated all the PLA's space-based C4ISR systems. The conduct of strategic reconnaissance using the spy balloons flying in 'near space' was also part of the SSF domain. When the Chinese spy balloons shooting down became a public spectacle, Xi was reportedly unhappy with SSF. Splitting SSF will now allow more focus on each sector. The SSF used to report directly to the all-powerful Chinese Military Commission (CMC), headed by President Xi Jinping. The SSF's previous mandate encompassed a wide array of responsibilities, potentially hindering specialised efforts and was therefore split within just a little more than eight years.

German Chancellor's China visit and growing divide between Berlin and Washington

German Chancellor Olaf Scholz was on his second visit to China in mid-April. He carried with him the traditional business delegation, which forms the fulcrum of Germany's China policy. He visited Bosch Hydrogen Powertrain Systems in Chongqing before proceeding to the financial capital of Shanghai. On his final day, he was on the formal part of his visit to Beijing, where he met Premier Li Qiang and concluded the day with a meeting with President Xi Jinping.

It was Scholz's first visit since the German China Strategy was announced in 2023, which annoyed China. Premier Li and a delegation of senior officials visited Berlin in June 2023. The strategy aimed at reducing dependence on the Chinese market in critical areas and bringing Germany into coherence with the EU's move for de-risking, superpower. The US expectation was that Scholz would push the Ukraine crisis agenda more than the economic cooperation agenda. For Germany, economic cooperation with China is more critical and direct. With Ukraine, they are part of a larger game plan in which they don't see themselves as the linchpin. Scholz took up the Ukraine issue, there is no clarity on what the Chinese said on what they will tell Russia to do. On the economic side, German business remains concerned that the promises China made to provide better access to them with Chinese state-owned companies for access to the Chinese market and controls over the use of German technology are slow, if at all, in fulfillment. China, on its part, complains that it is not getting the kind of support they expected from Germany, and though they are still major investors and trading partners, they face greater constraints in Europe and in Germany.

China was Germany's leading trade partner for the eighth consecutive year in 2023, with $254.1 billion traded in goods and services more than German trade with the US but a 15.5 per cent diminution from 2022. German exports to China were $7.3 billion.

China would like Germany to be more autonomous of US action, just as Germany expects China to show greater autonomy from Russia on the Ukraine issue. Perhaps both are misplaced perceptions. The US believed that Germany did not do enough for the coalition. Germany is showing that, given its own constraints and limitations, it is still trying to maintain a strategic autonomy over China, which has now more or less been vanquished with regard to Russia. Germany is aware that the Biden administration has set up close and direct contacts with Xi and his team. United States Secretary of State Antony Blinken visited China after Scholz, Janet Yellen at the Treasury, and Jake Sullivan as the NSA support Biden-Xi discussions.

Germany sees the US speaking more loudly but also doing more to engage China to prevent a breakdown. The political de-risking that the US has undertaken has led Germany to believe that it should not attempt economic decoupling but stick to the EU-led de-risking strategy on the economic side. Berlin is apprehensive that post-November US elections there could be a jolt in US politics, which would again leave Europe in general and Germany in particular in the lurch. Therefore, Germany sees it as prudent to have its own understanding of China, which is not dependent on the US. Scholz's second visit to China, still obtains the trend set by his SDP predecessor,

Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, who visited China six times between 1998 and 2005. The Christian Democratic Union's (CDU) Angela Merkel visited China 12 times in the 16 years that she was Chancellor. Not only does Scholz want to keep the strategic autonomy from the US, but even domestically, he wants to keep hold of the China policy within his government. The Greens-led Foreign Ministry, particularly Foreign Minister Annalena Baerbock, seeks a more demanding German policy towards China, linking it to human rights and possibly reducing the impact of the economic aspects on the policy. Scholz has not agreed with this approach and continues the dominating thoughts of German industry through the links that the Social Democratic Party (SPD) has with the Federation of German Industries (BDI) and believes that derisking would continue, which would be a

Blinken's China visit: Trump factor looms large over Sino-American ties

There were no great anticipations of any breakthrough from US Secretary of State Antony Blinken's recent visit to Shanghai and Beijing, but that does not indicate any insignificance of his five-hour-long conversations with his counterpart Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and a brief meeting with Chinese strongman President Xi Jinping. For the last several months, both the Biden administration and the Xi Jinping regime have been carefully struggling to stop further erosion of Sino-US bilateral relations and to manage mounting differences over a host of challenging issues. US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan in the face of stark Chinese resistance, continuing US trade conflict despite and since Biden's pretensions of imposing a high tariff on Chinese products, and apparent Chinese backup to Russia amidst the Ukraine War that has culminated in a new Russo-American Cold War.

Biden's disapproval of Beijing's pretensions of military muscle over South China Sea disputes and undue claim of sovereignty over numerous islands both in the South China Sea and East China Sea, Washington's elevation of Quadrilateral Security Dialogue to regular and summit-level meetings, US allegations of Chinese human rights violations in Xinjiang province and undermining democracy in Hong Kong, and several other issues have put the US and China on a trajectory of political hostility and diplomatic confrontation.

In a presidential election year, the Biden administration cannot afford to adopt a lenient policy towards China. But at the same time, President Biden is well aware of the importance of keeping the line of communication open with China and staying engaged in convergent areas of cooperation. After all, Nancy Pelosi's controversial Taiwan visit and the not-so-welcome Chinese balloon suspected of carrying out espionage activities in the American sky had pushed the bilateral ties between the two countries to rock bottom. At a time when unprecedented levels of US military assistance to Ukraine and massive sanctions against Russian aggression failed to bring the Russian economy to its knees, disengaging in bilateral conversations with China would be counterproductive. It could further push China to embrace Russia and, by implication, help Russia withstand US pressure. China had refused to hold military-to-military dialogue and had suspended numerous bilateral dialogues with the US due to a standoff on the Taiwan issue. It did not augur well for both countries, even as chances of accidental conflict due to misunderstanding or miscommunication increased many fold. Many US allies in Europe and Asia also turned apprehensive over the Sino-American schism, and some of them expressed their difficulties in taking sides.

The meetings between President Joe Biden and President Xi Jinping in Bali during the G20 summit in 2022 and in San Francisco during the APEC meeting were mindful efforts to maintain interactions at the highest levels in order to reduce miscommunication and remove misunderstandings. However, these meetings had little encouraging outcomes in terms of normalising the relationship. The US-China differences over a number of key issues persisted for too long to further complicate the relationship. Restoration of normal channels of communication became essential, and thus Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen had already visited China twice to sort out issues related to trade and investment. And the recent visit to China by Secretary of State Blinken is the second one about the flood of cheap Chinese goods landing in the US, and anxious about China's potential use of force against Taiwan. China, on the other hand, has been witnessing a slowdown in its economic growth, a meltdown of its real estate that contributes about one-third of its GDP, upset about US restrictions on exports of critical technology, angry against the Biden administration discouraging American companies to invest in China in sectors that can boost its military capabilities, furious over US arms transfers to Taiwan, and agitated about Washington's efforts to create triangular and quadrilateral groupings like AUKUS, US-Japan-South Korea, and Japan-Philippines-US strategic collaborations. Since both sides have thoughtful motives to keep holding dialogues, the language used during Secretary Blinken's visit to China was temperate. Blinken asked China to stop exporting goods that can enable the Russian defence industry to run smoothly.

In ten months. The telephonic conversations between the US Defence Secretary and his Chinese counterpart have also resumed. Yet, these are only signs of thaw; restoration of normal US-China ties is a long way off. The reasons why both Washington and Beijing are willing to hold regular consultations at high levels are voluminous. The US has been consistently monitoring the rising technological power of China, concerned about China maintaining closer ties with Russia, North Korea, and Iran, aware of its inability to dismantle or prevent Chinese militarization of the South China Sea Islands, disturbed strategic economic concept but would not be economic alone.

An analyst told me that Olaf Scholz's visit to China focused on the concerns of German businesses regarding unfair competition and inadequate access to networks and public tenders. He discussed this with various stakeholders, including students at Tongji University in Shanghai and members of the German Chamber of Commerce. Scholz emphasised the importance of maintaining competitiveness without resorting to protectionist measures and pledged to raise these issues in his political meetings. German industry is anxious about the growing unfair practices they encounter in China, including access to the competitive landscape. Many German companies operating in China feel marginalised and disadvantaged compared to their Chinese counterparts, including those in the EU. They worry about losing market share and fear the potential repercussions of any retaliatory measures if punitive actions, such as anti-dumping tariffs, are taken against Chinese imports under the China Strategy.

This cleavage between the SPD and the Greens prevents Germany from playing a greater role within Europe. Strategically, most analysts believe that Scholz's visit to China shows the persistent policy of Germany, as the largest economic player in Europe, constrained by a similar central role within the EU, NATO, and other organisations that are more strategically inclined. This is perhaps because Germany's assessment is that the international system today lacks stability and is facing crisis after crisis. The US and others believe that Germany could play a bigger role in the Ukraine by supplying weapons, by pushing China more, and by playing a role in West Asia. Germany sees that this instability also impacts Europe. German strength comes from its economy.
